Especially during this last week the battle at Dixmude and Ypres has taken on a character of unheard of violence.

Thrown back on the Yser, the Germans do not give up their plan to reach the ceast. They renew their efforts con-stantly and with extraordinary perse-verance. One officer said: "My brigverance. One officer said: "My brig-side on Wednesday was north of Ypres on a three-mile front. The enemy tried desperately to gain that point. Re-pulsed the first time with enormous losses, they came back in greater num-bers again and again without gaining any ground. At times we lost a little, but required it soon by a verance of-

"Thursday night, realizing the use-lessness of their efforts, the enemy slackened their attack, but for a short time only. Saturday morning they took the offensive again in the region south of Dixmude. There my men had to sustain a terrible shock. During forty hours they fought without a minute's ours they fought without a minute's est. By the violence of the attack it was easy to be seen the enemy was rying to make a decisive effort. It is
